The whole of this poem is in Agh. xvi, 164, Naṣr. 293-294; vv. 4-11, without the prelude, make up No. 54 of the Brit. Mus. MS. of the Mufaddalīyāt (Bm) and No. 74 (fol. 113 r. and v.) of the Kitāb al-Ikhtiyārain (Kk), both of which insert v. 11 between vv. 8 and 9. The Maṣāri al-Ushshāq (Const. ed.) p. 329 has the story, and quotes vv. 4, 8, 5, and 6.

yad'uwahu ilà-l-Islāmi wa-ya'riḍahu 'alaihi, "The Prophet did not despise anyone so as not to invite him to accept Islam or to offer it to him"; so also in Ṭabarī, i, 139720: 'akramtu saifa Rasūli-llāhi 'an 'aqtula bihi-mra'atan: "I honoured the sword of the Prophet so much that I could not kill a woman with it."*

"To gather provision for the way," tazawwud, is used metaphorically of pleasant memories which friends carry away with them after parting: see index to Mufaddt. ii, p. 384.

Shaml is a word not adequately explained by the Lexx.: it is a vague and rather general term, but when construed with jam' may be rendered "harmony, unity of feeling, pleasant intercourse." Cf. Ibn Hishām 5188: Amsau bi-ḥamdi-llāhi mujtami i-sh-shamli. "They were—God be praised!—living together in harmony."

- (2) That maghnam here has the meaning of "gain," and not of "spoiling" appears to be clear from the parallel passage of Muraqqish, where saiban muqbilā corresponds to it.
- (5) Notice the two opposite meanings of afra'a "he ascended," and also "he descended": here the sense is the latter.
- (6) The reference, according to the tradition, is to Marthad's young wife: see the story as eited above.

After v. 25 Kk and Bm have an additional verse:

TRANSLATION

Vv. 1-3, prelude: v. 4, self-praise: vv. 5-7, quarrel with his people, perhaps connected with the false accusation brought against him by the wife of his uncle Marthad (see No. I). Vv. 8-15, praise of his tribe, notwithstanding their alienation. He uses the same battle-cry (v. 8), and observes the same religious rites (9, 10). In the bitterness of winter and famine they are foremost in feeding the hungry (11-15). Then follows a description of a battle with their foes, a mighty host (16-18), whom the House of Mālik encounter with a vigour equal to their own (19-22). His clan bear their losses with dignity (23, 24), and so do their enemies (25). Praise of their steadfastness (25a). The poem is regarded by Arab critics as a fine example of those which give due praise to the author's foes (al-munṣifāt), perhaps in this case the sister-tribe of Taghlib, with whom Bakr waged the long War of al-Basūs. Vv. 9 and 10 are specially notable for their mention of common religious rites, which are very seldom referred to in the ancient poetry.

- (1) I see that my neighbour has flitted, and flitted also her admonisher: how love-worthy were she to me, but for distance and her self-will!
- (2) Go thy way then, with a star that ceases not to carry an evil influence: the most ill-omened bird of the diviners is that which passes from left to right.
- (3) And if thou oppose me, know that opposition is a character of mine, when my nature is not met with gentleness answering to its own.
- (4) I exchange loans with my fellows, and I render honestly to them what is owing: I respect myself, [and am generous] what time niggardliness brings ruin to those who suffer from it.
- (5) Notwithstanding that my people have driven me away, and my place of sojourn has come to be in a land the clamour of which is far different from that of mine.
- (6) Piercing [calumnies] penetrated to me from them, and pained me, and their hearts cherished hatred against me within.
- (7) Therefore I said 'To shift my abode is the best thing for me in the relations which exist between us: he who departs is quit of a dwelling that brings him pain':
- (8) Notwithstanding that I shout [in battle] the war-cry of their Father's name, when the clamour spreads through the host, and those of pure stock gather close together;

- (15) This verse, like v. 11, is imitated from one by the Elder Muraqqish, Mufaddt. L, 12. The game of Maisir was played with ten arrows, seven of which carried portions of the slain camel which constituted the stakes, and were marked with notches (made with the teeth) indicating the number of portions assigned to each, while three were blank. Of these blanks the manih was one. The game is constantly mentioned in the old poetry in connection with the feeding of the poor in times of famine by rich people, who offered their camels for slaughter, and by means of the game distributed the charge among themselves. See Mufaddt. ii, index, s.v. Maisir. Another possible meaning of manih is "borrowed," i.e., a lucky arrow borrowed for its good luck: LA iii, 446, bottom. See note at end of this book referring to Tarafah viii, 3.
- (17) The MS. has tuzji-sh-shamsa, which seems to make no sense. Kk and Bm have tuzji-s-samma (repeated in the gloss), which I take to refer to the deadly spear-points, couched in the onset. The wounds of spear-points are called samman muqashshabā in Mufaḍḍt. exiii, 19; and in No. XIII, v. 27, post, our poet calls an arrow dhu'āf, "poison." Prof. Bevan suggests reading sumra, "tawny [spears]," but this seems to me unnecessary. The feminine pronoun in ṣabūḥuhā probably refers to malmūmah in v. 16.
- (18) The word dabā'ir in this verse is not clearly explained in the Lexx., which render it "troops," or "companies," and the gloss of Kk has an illegible and unintelligible word for it: it seems probable that it is a metathesis of darā'ib, "divers kinds." The additional gloss in Bm seems to indicate a reading sabā'ir, pl. of subārah, "a white cloud." The verb arāḥa occurs three times in this poem, in vv. 18, 19, and 25a; in each case the primary sense is "to bring home (camels) from pasture in the evening"; used metaphorically, it is applied to warriors returning home after fight, and murīḥ means the herdsman (i.e., captain or leader) who controls them. In v. 18 I understand the sense to be that the leader of the enemy's party cannot be turned back, and similarly those who follow him.
- (19) In this verse the battle-cry, da'wah, is personified in lahā 'irbatun: "it has a craving" which must be satisfied, and goes onwards until it finds some one who leads it back homewards (yurīḥuhā) satiated with blood.
- (21) The verb nahaza is properly to draw a bucket through the water in order to fill it: Naq. 779¹⁰. The comparison of spears to well-ropes is a commonplace in the ancient poetry: e.g., Mufaddt. xxii, 21.
- (22) For the "War-mill" cf. Mu'allaqah of Zuhair v. 31, and that of 'Amr b. Kulthūm v. 26. Since a mill does not yield milk, the fem. pronoun in laqūļuhā must refer to Ḥarb, War, understood: see index to Mufaddt. ii, 336 "War."

TRANSLATION

This piece has lost its prelude with the double rhyme. Vv. 1-6: in his old age the poet recalls his former prowess as a raider: after v. 6 there is probably a lacuna, in which the achievement of the raiders was described. Vv. 7 and 8 are detached verses which must have belonged to a passage describing the poet's liberality in offering hospitality to strangers. Vv. 9-15, an often-cited lamentation over the decay due to old-age.

- (1) If now I have no longer the strength to undertake a long journey, how many noble companions have I led forth in time past!
- (2) I said to them 'Go on your way—may my mother's sister be your sacrifice! Feel ye not the wind that burns with summer heat?'
- (3) Then did they set themselves to the pale-coloured camels whose flesh had been trained down to hardness, their pasterns bound round with the thongs that tied on their shoes;
- (4) And I betook myself to a stout she-camel, strong as a stallion, bulky, that answered my pulling tight her fore-girth with a roaring,
- (5) And I journeyed with them the night through till the rising of the sun, taking my way unerringly although the darkness thereof was mixed with dust;
- (6) And I brought them down to drink at a water just at the right time, where [by reason of its remoteness and freedom from disturbance] were gathered together a mixed multitude of sandgrouse and doves.

* * * * * * * * *

- (7) And the lightest hand of all in estimation, that can never do thee any harm, is the hand among other hands that is stretched into the vessel of food—
- (8) Whether the hand of a stranger or one of near kin, brought to thee by a violent north-wind that blows the dust along.

* * * * * * * * *

(9) Now am I, that have passed the space of ninety years, as though on a day I had stripped off the cheek-straps of my bridle;

- (10) I raise myself painfully on three supports, by the help of my hands and a staff, and after that I stand upright.
- (11) The Daughters of Time have shot at me from a place which I could not see: and how should he fare who is shot at, while he cannot shoot in reply?
- (12) Yea, if it were an arrow that shot me, I could have defended myself against it: but I am shot with that which is not a shaft.
- (13) When men see me, they say—'Art thou not he that but lately was bright with new arms and armour, no sluggish fighter?'
- (14) Yea, I perish: but of Time I cannot kill even a night; and that which I slay of him amounts not even to a thread for stringing beads upon.
- (15) I am slain by looking forward to day and night, and looking onward to year after year.

NOTES

- (2) For the use of the word "sacrifice" here see index to Mufaddt. ii, 385: the mother's sister, khālah, figures as its subject in Mufaddt. xxxii, 1.
- (3) For the leather shoes worn by riding-camels see Mufaddt. ii, index, 385, and ante, No. II, v. 14.
- (9) Apparently the poet compares himself to a war-horse which through age is no longer fit for use in battle.
 - (11) For "the Daughters of Time" cf. Mufaddt. lxxx, 1.
- (13) The scholia show that this verse (as usual in a passage much quoted) has a large number of variants.

TRANSLATION

This well-known poem is in the Ḥamāsah, p. 504; Abū Tammām has shown his good taste by pruning away v. 6, a fragment which has little or nothing to do with the verses that survive. A rendering of the verses in the Ḥamāsah will be found in my Translations (1885), p. 2.

- (1) Alas my soul for Youth that's gone! no light thing lost I when he fled.
- (2) Time was I dwelt in joy of prime, .
 hurling back wrong, casting down the wild goats,
- (3) Trailing my skirts and robes of price to the nearest tavern, shaking forth my locks.
- (4) Nay, envy not a man that folk say 'Age has made him a Judge of men':
- (5) Though he love life and live long safe, long living leaves its print on his face.
- (6) Some men there be that are their people's life, and some bear a stain like a spot of grease.

NOTES

- (2) "Wrong," daim, any injustice that is sought to be put upon the speaker. The wild goats are invariably referred to as dwellers in inaccessible mountain places, and to cast them down is therefore a great feat of adventure and agility.
- (3) In peace-time the Arab warrior girt himself loosely with his waist cloth, izār, allowing it to trail on the ground; when there was serious business on hand he girt it up tight. "The nearest tavern," lit. "the nearest of my wine-sellers," implying a right of possession. The wine-sellers were chiefly Jews, dwelling under the protection (jiwār) of the tribe: see Mufaḍḍt. ii, p. 34.
- (4) Hakam, a Judge or Sage, one esteemed for his wisdom and experience of life. The old traditions tell of many such: see Mufaddt. ii, pp. 109 and 264. This verse is imitated from one by the poet's uncle the Elder Muraqqish: Mufaddt. liv, 35.

TRANSLATION

This fragment wants its prelude. Vv. 1-4, journey to the poet's tribe, Sa'd b. Mālik, of Qais b. Tha'labah. Vv. 5-13, praise of the tribe.

- (1) [My she-camel] whimpers with yearning for [the house of] Mālik. Plain thou with thy yearning! even now I take my way upwards
- (2) Towards the abode of a people fair of face—great are their tents of leather, long the fore-part of their spears.
- (3) Then I guided the caravan through a droughty desert—little sound was therein save the calls of young ostriches.

V. 13 is cited with the poet's name in LA xvii, 41416, and Bakrī 665.

- 2. Uwāl is the ancient name of the island now called Baḥrain. For 'Adaulà, said to be a village in Baḥrain where ships were built, see Yāqūt. The name is applied to ships in Tarafah, Mu'all. 4.

Ad-Dathīnah in v. 4 is, to judge from the adjacent names, not the place so called in the territory of Fazārah, mentioned by an-Nābighah, x, 23.

Al-Ḥisā mentioned in v. 5 may be the region now called al-Aḥsā, with its capital Hufhūf.

13. Bakrī strangely takes سِرْبال and سِرْبال to be proper names.

TRANSLATION

The geographical names in this piece are discussed in the notes to the Arabic text; the translation adopts Maṭālī in place of the Miṭāl of the text for the reason stated in the note to the Arabic. The occurrence of the name Sulaimà in v. 9, after Taktum has been mentioned in vv. 1 and 6, might suggest that fragments of two separate poems have here been put together: but v. 10 is evidently the answer to v. 6—notice the repetition of the word 'ajīb—, and v. 10 is the natural sequel of v. 9. It seems best, therefore, to take Taktum and Sulaimà as two names for the same woman.

- (1) Never will my heart forget Taktum! she has enslaved me, but has no mind for union with me.
- (2) Seest thou her caravan passing swiftly along, like ships of 'Adaulà coming home at evening from Uwāl?
- (3) In the afternoon they came down from Suwaiqah of the Water, then in the evening they made for the mountain side of Maṭālī;

- (4) Then in the forenoon they were at ad-Dathīnah, not sparing to push on the breasts of the camels:
- (5) Then was al-Ḥisā their abiding place in the summer: there [the maids] set up their pavilions under the hanging branches of trees.
- (6) Taktum was startled and expressed her wonder, whenas she saw how my condition to-day had changed for the worse.
- (7) 'O daughter of the good! verily we are the bond-slaves of the changes of days and of nights.
- (8) 'Time has made an onset and taken me as his object; and aforetime he was wont to cast his snares upon others like me.
- (9) 'His arrows hit me straight when they are shot at me, and my shafts, O Sulaimà, turn away and miss him.
- (10) 'There is no marvel in what thou seest: but cause for wonder there is how fated ends overtake all on every side;
- (11) 'They seize hold of the mottled crocodile in the waves, and the wild goats on the mountain peaks,
- (12) 'And the solitary wild bull with his face streaked with brown and the brown band on his sides, that chooses the [seeming] safe sands for his dwelling,
- (13) 'And they address themselves to the overthrow of the champion, the terror of his foes, by a thrust between his camel's hair jerkin and his coat of mail.'

NOTE

(11) The poet was no doubt familiar with crocodiles in the Euphrates and Tigris. The "wild bull" of v. 12 is the Oryx beatrix.

This fragment is given again on page 24 of the MS., but there is no variety of reading: the second version is more correct in writing to in v. 1, where the first has بَسُرِجِهِ in v. 3 where the first has بِسُرِجِهِ. The second, in v. 3, reads أَكَارِمُهُ for أُكَارِمُهُ, a change which seems to make no sense.

The first version in v. 4 glosses ذَنْبِي by ذَنْبِي.

- (1) Many the client who had few to help him, far away from his home, in respect of whom I have taken upon myself what no one undertakes on my behalf;
- (2) When he saw me advancing towards him, he heartened his shout against his adversary, and raised himself high over him with whom he was contending.
- (3) And many the short-haired steed, stepping proudly, have I given as a gift, together with his saddle, to one who sought a favour of me without any claim of relationship, or to one who bore himself boldly whom I desired to honour, seeking an acknowledgement from him in return:
- (4) Notwithstanding that my people have given me up to the companionship of my sins: and a man's people are his claws [with which he wounds his adversary] and the props which hold him up.

NOTES

Again, in v. 4, we have a reference to the alienation between the poet and his tribe. In v. 1 maulà may mean "cousin": but "client" seems better, as a cousin would not in the case described be far from his kin or lacking in helpers. In v. 4 aslamūnī wa-urratī is an example of the wāw al-ma'īyah, which governs an accusative (Wright, Gram.³ ii, p. 84).

Bakrī 669²⁰ has v. 2 with the poet's name, and with the reading الْعَبَابِ for الْعَبَابِ. Al-'Unāb is said to be a place between the lands of Yashkur and those of Asad: according to others, a black mountain by the side of the sands of al-'Udhaibah.

- (1) Hast thou recognized the dwelling place after many long years, with its marks all but effaced, like the writing of a book?
- (2) When I recognized the place where the tribe had dwelt, in the low ground at the foot of the mountain, to the right of al-'Unāb,
- (3) I seemed to myself like a gambler who cleaves steadfastly to the bag in which the gaming arrows are kept, until at the day's end he is ruined and has lost heavily in all his wagers,
- (4) In grief over thee, O Son of Sa'd; and already hoariness has worn out in thee the garment of fresh youth.

NOTES

V. 1. The comparison of tent-traces to writing in a book, which later became hackneyed, is found as far back as the poet's uncle Muraqqish the Elder (Mufaddt. liv, 2), who, according to tradition, was himself able to write. In the rendering I have substituted al-'Unāb for the al-Ḥubāb of the text, because the former name (the reading of Bakrī) is found in the Geographers, and the latter is not. The "Son of Sa'd" may be one of the poet's uncles, Marthad or Muraqqish the Elder. In v. 4 the concluding words probably refer to the poet himself, not to the person addressed in the first hemistich: such shiftings of person are common in the old poetry.

TRANSLATION

Vv. 1-6, the amatory prelude, beginning with deserted dwellings and recalling the departure of the ladies, who are compared to gazelles. Then one particular lady is mentioned, the poet's Beloved, who as a gazelle is furnished (in order to heighten her ideal charm—see 'Abīd, xxx, 3-5) with a fawn (v. 7). The dwelling of the pair in Dhāt al-Ḥādh is described (v. 8), and then the picture passes to the rain-cloud which waters the region (vv. 9-12) and keeps it green. Then the poet passes on to the subject of his praise, Imra' al-Qais son of 'Amrah, whose dwelling-place is also included in the range of the rainfall (v. 13). This chief's prowess in fight is celebrated (vv. 14-15), and then his generosity in making gifts of camels of the most approved and valuable kinds (vv. 16, 17), of which he possesses a very large number (vv. 18, 19). The ode is remarkable for the artifice of its transition from one subject to another, and seems to be complete.

- (1) Why do not the traces of deserted dwellings stir thy longing? Nay rather, why do not thoughts of love leave the old man behind [and vex him no more]?
- (2) Or was it those dwellers in the place from whom he received his death-stroke, when they betrayed him, what time they moved forth on their way,
- (3) And thou sawest the train of ladies' litters one following another as they travelled up the mountain roads, their pace a trot?
- (4) Bright red were the tufts of wool on the camels' gear, and on the stuffs from ar-Ruhā [with which the litters were covered], and the veils thrown over them.
- (5) It seemed as though gazelles of the sand-stretches were hidden therein behind the curtains, screened from the heat of the sun.

- (11) In these descriptions of rain the south wind always plays an important part: cf. 'Abīd, Dīw. vi, 6, 7; xxviii, 14.
- (13) This Imra' al-Qais cannot be further identified: it is not the poet, son of Hujr of Kindah, for his mother's name was Fāṭimah, sister of Kulaib and Muhalhil. It might be the name of a tribe or sub-tribe, but the praise which follows (vv. 14-19) seems clearly to indicate an individual.
- (18, 19) All through the winter and spring the sap in the herbage and bushes on which the camels feed is so abundant that they require no water, and for this condition of the herds there is a special verb, jaza'a; when the summer comes they are driven to the watering-place, but are so many that they cannot all be watered at the trough, haud, and some have to get a separate supply drawn for them in great buckets, $dhin\bar{a}b$, pl. of $dhan\bar{u}b$; even these they soon exhaust. V. 19 thus seems to imply a great multitude of beasts.

وَشَاعِرِ قَوْمٍ أُولِي بِغْضَةٍ قَمَعْتُ فَصَارُوا لِثَامًا ذِلَالًا

- (1) Umāmah is gone far from thee, and there is left for thee only to ask after her the place where she dwelt, and the vision of her that comes when thou dreamest—
- (2) Its appointed time is when night closes in, and as soon as dawn breaks it refuses to stay any longer.
- (3) Yea, this is what she gives in exchange for my love of her; and if she were here she would not grant me a single boon.
- (4) Sooth, fear seized my heart when they proclaimed their purpose, and men said, 'Our comrades are preparing for an early departure';
- (5) And the two captains of the caravan hurried her swiftly away at earliest dawn, after stirring up the male camels to rise from the place where they couched—

TRANSLATION

The metre of this poem, as noted in the MS., does not conform to the standard scheme of the $Sari^c$: the first two verses (reading in v. 2 with all the citations ashrabu-l-waghla and not as our text) are correct $Sari^c$: but in all the other verses, except the first hemistich of v. 5, the final group -v- has been put into the place of the middle -v-, and the latter transposed to the end of the hemistich.

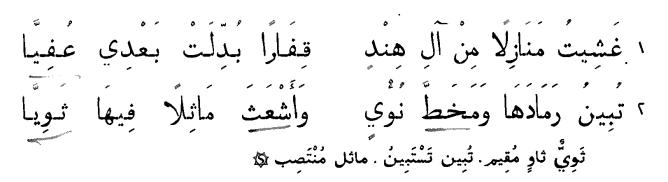

- (1) Many the man whose senses have led him to folly, in that he says on a day 'Verily 'Amr has become a drunkard!'
- (2) If I be a drinker of much wine, at least I drink at my own cost and not as a spunger upon others, and the camel is not safe from my slaughtering sword.
- (3) The wine-skin is a kingdom to him who possesses it, and the kingdom therein, though small, how great it is!
- (4) Therein is the morning draught, which makes of me a lion of 'Ifirrīn, with great wealth mine—
- (5) At the beginning of the night a glorious warrior, at the end of the night a male hyæna unable to keep his legs.
- (6) God curse thee for a drink! would that the resolute man could keep himself away from thee!

NOTES

- (3) The rendering follows the v.l. mentioned in the scholion.
- (4) The old scholars did not know the meaning or origin of the word 'Ifirrin; it is probably a place-name.
- (6) The sentiment of this verse is I think unique among ancient Arabian poets. The phrase $q\bar{a}talaka$ -llāhu, "God curse thee!" (lit. "fight against thee"), may be used for admiration as well as execration: see my Translations, pp. 57-58; but here the latter seems to be the sense.

The only v. in this poem which has as yet been found cited elsewhere is No. 8, given in LA v, 16320, with 'Amr's name and with البَوَاك for البَوَاك. The first hemistich of v. 13 appears, with feminine verbs and a different conclusion, in an anonymous verse in LA iii, 33113. In v. 16 the MS. reads ذَكُرُتُ , and in v. 28 أَوْتِي مَا لَا اللهُ ال

- (11) "To give cares the entertainment" of a good fast riding-camel is a figurative way of saying that he drove away his cares by riding at a swift pace the animal he proceeds to describe.
- (13) The rendering of the second hemistich here given is that suggested by Prof. Bevan: I offer it with some diffidence. If we could take sada'a as meaning "to divide into classes," we might translate "most capable in respect of that in regard to which riding-camels are classified," i.e., speed. There is some difficulty in taking yushihu in this verse in a different sense from mushihun in v. 18; but the Lexx. clearly recognize both meanings.
- (16) Andarūn will be remembered as the name of a place from which wine was imported, mentioned in the Mu'all. of 'Amr b. Kulthūm, v. 1. According to Yāqūt it is a village a day's journey to the south of Aleppo, on the border of the Desert.
- (23) Shiryānah is the name of a species of Zizyphus: a bow made from it is mentioned in the Mufaddt. i, xvi, 24. Taqallud must here have the secondary sense of undertaking, exercising a function: but it would be better to read taqallubihā.
- (24) No precise information regarding the qadb-tree, from which the arrows were made, is obtainable; see Lane, s.v. According to some authorities it is the same as the nabah, which is identified as Grewia populifolia.
- (31) This verse is better placed after v. 32. The hunter's wife may be assumed, in consequence of the disappointment of the expectations mentioned in v. 32, to have greeted him with some harsh speech; v. 31 then says: "If he should requite her abuse with a slap on the face" (notice "hand" expressed by dhātu khamsin, "that which has five [fingers]"), "he would get back from her two blows for his one." Compare the scene of the return of the unsuccessful hunter to his family in Muzarrid's poem in the Mufaddt., No. XVII, 69 to end.

In Aghānī xvi, 165-6. The story comes from Abū 'Amr ash-Shaibānī (Isḥāq b. Mirār): the verses come from Mu'arrij. In Agh. we find جلالة in v. I ("advanced in age"). In v. 2 I have adopted from Agh. نقال ننا: our MS. has فقال ننا: which makes no sense.

TRANSLATION

Imra' al-Qais son of Hujr, prince of Kindah, visited the tribe of Bakr son of Wā'il, and pitched there his tents of leather. He asked them whether they had a poet among them. 'Yes,' said they: 'an old man of Qais son of Tha'labah defends our tribal honour.' He asked that he might be summoned, and when 'Amr son of Qamī'ah appeared, besought him to recite some of his poems, which he much admired. Imra' al-Qais then proposed to 'Amr to accompany him [on his journey to the Qaiṣar], which he agreed to do, and set out with him; but he died on the journey far away from home, and was therefore called by the Arabs 'Amr the Lost.' These verses were made by 'Amr in reference to the proposal of Imra' al-Qais:

- (1) I complained to him that I was a man broken in condition, old, with a large family, and suffering from scarcity of milk:
- (2) He said to us in answer—'Welcome to your own people, to an easy life, and wide spaces! If ye would like flesh of the wild game to eat, then mount and ride with us.'

NOTES

The celebrated journey of Imra' al-Qais to the Emperor (Justinian) at Constantinople, to ask his help in obtaining vengeance for the murder of his father Ḥujr by the men of Asad (see Introduction to the Dīwān of 'Abīd), is described in No. XX of that poet's Dīwān (Ahlw. pp. 128-131). The ode is a patch-work of incoherent passages, and has at least three separate openings, viz. vv. 1, 19, and 20; perhaps the last is the real opening of the original poem dealing with the journey into Asia Minor. 'Amr b. Qamī'ah figures in it as the poet's companion in vv. 43 and 44:

- "My comrade wept when he saw the Pass [ad-Darb, the pass over the Taurus leading to Derbe] behind him, and knew for certain that we were approaching the land of Cæsar:
- "I said to him—'Let not thine eye weep: verily we shall achieve a kingdom, or shall die and be excused.'"

From the last piece in our MS. (No. XVI) it would appear that 'Amr b. Qamī'ah was accompanied on the journey by his daughter.

TRANSLATION

This poem offers several difficulties, which in the absence of a commentary it is not easy to solve. It consists of two parts: vv. 1-13, the nasīb or amatory prelude, and vv. 14—to end, an account of a journey to the court of al-Mundhir III, King of al-Ḥīrah, to which the poet repairs to justify himself against an accusation which he protests is false; this part winds up with five verses in praise of the King.

- (1) Umāmah is gone far from thee, and there is left for thee only to ask after her the encampments where she dwelt, and ever-growing remoteness from her has taken the place to thee of union;
- (2) A distant destination has carried her far away, bringing alienation in exchange to those who offered sincere affection.
- (3) The leader of the camp gave the call for departure: then quickly all betook themselves to making ready for the start;

This piece is in Yāqūt iii, 77. It is cited in Nașr. 295, and Khiz. ii, 247-50.

V. 2 is in Bakrī 7654, and LA xviii, 29713. The first two vv. in Sībawaihi, vol. 1, 762 and 12022.

V. 2 in 'Umdah ii, 213. The passage is discussed at great length in Khiz. ii, 247-50.

TRANSLATION

- (1) The daughter of 'Amr asked me of the country, of which she did not recognise the way-marks;
- (2) When she saw Sātīdamā, she wept: sooth, a strange man were he who would blame her to-day!
- (3) She called to remembrance the land in which was her people, her uncles therein on the mother's and the father's side.

NOTES

This passage is cited by the grammarians for the example which it displays of the insertion in v. 2 of al-yauma between lillāhi darru and the word it governs, man, a remarkable license made necessary by reasons of metre. The verse is also noticeable for its use of lillāhi darru man, &c., not in praise, but in blame: the use of this idiom is generally spoken of in the Lexx. and grammars as expressive only of admiration: but it is also used, though more rarely, for surprise or astonishment in general, and therefore sometimes in relation to conduct which is not admirable, but extraordinary only. See Mufaddt. ii, p. 116, note to v. (4).

Of Sātīdamā different accounts are given in the Geographies: it is generally supposed to be a mountain, but the compilers knew nothing certain about it. The name is evidently non-Arabic. The course of Imra' al-Qais's journey, as described in his poem relating to it, took him north through the Ḥaurān to Damascus, and thence through Syria by Ba'labakk and the Orontes Valley (Ḥamāh and Shaizar are mentioned): thence he crossed the Amanus and Taurus ranges. Sātīdamā may possibly be the name of a mountain in that region.

TRANSLATION

- (1) Already before thee there have been Kings of Ghassān, and Kings of the house of Naṣr, men who scattered favours around;
- (2) They wore their royal dignity like a crown, men of high emprise; but they perished, as the peoples of old have vanished away.
- (3) Think not that Time will give perpetuity to you, or stay his march for you, when he stopped not for them;
- (4) If he could have done so, he had stayed for Tubba', and the Masters of mighty works, 'Ād and Iram.

NOTE

The House of Naṣr is the family of the Kings of al-Ḥīrah. Since the dynasties both of Ghassān and of the Lakhmite Kings of al-Ḥīrah were at the height of their power during 'Amr's life and for long after his death, it is extremely unlikely that these verses, which treat them as great names of the past, are rightly ascribed to him. Their theme is one repeatedly handled by the old poets and their imitators.

TRANSLATION

Already had he stripped from him his drawers wrongfully, and they defiled the upper part of his neck with blood on a Friday.

NOTE

Prof. Bevan writes: "'Arūbah is given in the Lexx. as an old name for Friday, yaum al-Jum'ah: it is the Jewish-Aramaic 'ărūbhtā. It is remarkable that this expression, as well as the characteristic word 'ilāwah, meaning 'the upper part of the neck at the base of the skull,' occurs in exactly the same manner in some verses ascribed to A'shà Hamdān (Ahlwardt's Anonyme Arabische Chronik, p. 330). A friend of the poet, named Fandash b. Ḥayyān al-Hamdānī, had a quarrel with a man and wounded him slightly. For this act Fandash was slain by the well-known Ibn al-Ash'ath, who is addressed by al-A'shà as follows:

The first of these verses is quoted by LA, s.v. فندش (anonymously). I suspect that the verse which is cited in the Asās is really by A'shà Hamdān, and refers to the same incident,—which occurred in the reign of the Khalīfah 'Abd al-Malik."

In the Ḥamāsah p. 276 these verses appear in a poem ascribed to Sulmī b. Rabī'ah of Dabbah; in the Aṣma'īyāt the poem (no. 16) is attributed to 'Ilbā b. Arīm (read Arqam); in the Amālī of al-Qālī the former is mentioned as the author. The matter of the verses recurs frequently in the old poetry: cf. ante No. II, v. 15.

TRANSLATION

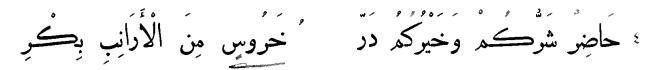

- (1) What time the maidens are hidden in a veil of smoke, and make haste to set the cauldrons on the fire, and find the time long [before the meat is cooked],
- (2) Then do the gaming-arrows in my hands yield abundantly provision for our dependants, from the upper part of the humps of great she-camels ten months gone in pregnancy.

NOTE

In v. 1 fa-mallati may possibly mean "they also roast (or rather broil) [some of the food]," and is so interpreted by Tibrīzī in his commentary to the Ḥamāsah; but I prefer the rendering I have chosen: it is often said, in describing such scenes, that the expectant guests, in their hunger, try to anticipate the full cooking of the food (see the index to the Mufaḍḍt. vol. ii). The "maidens," al-adhārà, are here the free-born daughters of the household, not the handmaids, al-imā', of the next piece.

Jāḥidh, Hayawān v, 2614-17 and vi, 11718-21 (in both passages extremely corrupt).

. شُرُّكُمْ حاضْر The last verse is given in LA vii, 36418, without the poet's name, and with the reading

TRANSLATION

- (1) My temper is not the temper of hares, what time the flow of milk of the milch camels becomes scanty in the winter cold,
- (2) And thou seest the handmaids crouching like old roots of trees, sticking close to the place where the pot is set;
- (3) And thou seest the smoke, like dark-coloured mud, curling forth from behind the women's curtain.
- (4) Your evil qualities are always ready, but your good is like the milk-flow of a young hare in her first pregnancy.

NOTE

The text of these verses is made up by combining and amending the readings of the two places in Jāḥiḍh's Ḥayawān where they are cited: like almost all the poetical quotations in that book as printed at Cairo, they are disgracefully mishandled by the editor. Fortunately the last verse occurs in the Lisān. Jāḥiḍh is speaking of the idea which prevailed among the Arabs that the female hare is the animal which yields the least milk to its young after their birth. The description is that of famine in winter time.

Jāḥidh, Ḥayawān i, 16920.

This verse is also cited by Jāḥidh in the Kitāb al-Bayān wa-t-Tibyān i, 159⁵, with the reading عُن الْأَصْل.

TRANSLATION

And a lifter-up of burdens from the main-stock of his tribe when they come upon them, and none else can handle them though he strive his utmost.

NOTE

The verse is quoted in connexion with the condemnation by Jāḥiḍh of forced and strained interpretations of words, and in illustration of Qur'ān xxxviii, 86, for the meaning of تَكُنُّكُ.

ADDITIONAL NOTES

In Țabari's commentary on the Qur'an, vol. i, 180, and ii, 49, the following verse is attributed to 'Amr b. Qami'ah:

The verse is however by al-Ḥādirah: see Mufaḍḍt. viii, 7.

In al-Marzūqī's Kitāb al-Azminah wa-l-Amkinah, vol. ii, p. 389, the first three verses of Tarafah's poem No. VIII (Ahlw. Six Poets, p. 65) are cited as by 'Amr b. Qamī'ah. The passage is remarkable because it has the expression رَفَعُوا الْمَنْيَلِيّ, apparently in the sense "they betook themselves to the gaming-arrows," using منيح not in the more usual (or perhaps later) sense of an arrow to which no share in the stakes was allotted, but which was put in merely to make up the required number, but rather as meaning an arrow with shares, perhaps a lucky arrow: see the second explanation given to No. II, v. 15, ante. For the ordinary meaning of manīḥ see Dīw. of 'Āmir b. aṭ-Ṭufail, scholion to xi, 2, and Ḥamāsah 208, bottom.
